

As a government agency your role should be defined as promoting technology and communications improvements, not impeding them for the benefit of present licensees of broadcast spectrum. As the number of radio station ownerships has dwindled down to a few major corporations, they can make a louder noise regarding protecting their businesses. The FCC should make a point of reminding these license holders that a free market requires competition and XM is giving that very thing to them. Success should depend on the quality of their product, it should not be guaranteed as a result of having a license.
